Cities reflects organic relationship

NANCY TOOLEY

CALGARY HERALD

When you think about it, making a painting of an entire city or even part of a building is an almost impossible task. In New York, London, Hamilton or any other community in the world, few artists have ever tried, let alone succeeded. It takes a particular kind of bravery. It involves a lot of preparation, which the painter John Hartman has done. To get a fix on Calgary, for example, he rented a little studio at the Spadina Hotel, and flew in several nights a week. He even brought his girlfriend, Sarah, with him. The view from the hotel room is a cityscape that includes the Bow Tower, the Calgary Tower, the Calgary Tower, and the skyline of the city. The artist is able to see the city from a bird's eye view, which is a unique perspective.

The problem is that Calgary is a city that is constantly changing. The downtown core is in constant flux, with new buildings being constructed and old buildings being torn down. This makes it difficult for the artist to capture the city's essence.

Hartman's solution is to create a series of paintings that capture the city's essence in different guises. He has divided the city into five sections, each of which is painted in a different style. The first section is a series of abstract paintings that capture the city's energy and vitality. The second section is a series of impressionistic paintings that capture the city's beauty and tranquility. The third section is a series of realistic paintings that capture the city's history and culture. The fourth section is a series of expressionistic paintings that capture the city's emotions and feelings. The fifth section is a series of surrealistic paintings that capture the city's imagination and creativity.

Hartman's paintings are a testament to his skill as a painter. He is able to capture the city's essence in a way that is both realistic and imaginative. His paintings are a celebration of the city, and a reminder of the beauty and power that can be found in the urban environment.

Hartman's paintings are a reminder of the power of the city. They are a celebration of the city's history, culture, and beauty. They are a reminder of the importance of the city in our lives, and the role that it plays in shaping our world.